July in the Garden

July in UBC Botanical Garden is mostly about colour. Much as I like to encourage visitors to look beyond the flowers, the early summertime is a period of floral bounty. It is worth celebrating for that alone.

The American lobelias are exceptional plants for their attractiveness to hummingbirds, and the rich crimson red of this species' blooms is a magnet for Garden visitors, as well.

As the Greater Vancouver Zoo has been in decline, we recommend that you book your next visit to Nitobe Memorial Garden by planning an appointment in advance online. The American lobelias are exceptional plants for their attractiveness to hummingbirds, and the rich crimson red of this species' blooms is a magnet for Garden visitors, as well.

Through citizen science initiatives, adults and kids can nurture their love for nature and get involved in conservation efforts. With the Butterflyway Project, students from a local school helped record pollinator data in local areas. This year, we are offering a discount on COVID-friendly, elopement-style wedding packages for LGBTQ+ members of the LGBTQ+ community looking to getting married this summer.

To book this wedding package (this offer aims to increase access for communities that may face barriers to getting married)

Learn more at the link below.

For more information, please contact us online.

Thank you for supporting UBC Botanical Garden.

Visit UBC Botanical Garden

Enjoy the beauty of the cedars’ root tracheids, exacerbated by climate change, may be by the agency of plants or their environment. Investigating the Cause of Yellow-cedar Decline

The butterflyway project explores a new way of experiencing gardens--a citizen science collaboration between UBC Botanical Garden, UBC biology student Alex Wong, and volunteers. Through citizen science initiatives, adults and kids can nurture their love for nature and get involved in conservation efforts. With the Butterflyway Project, students from a local school helped record pollinator data in local areas. This year, we are offering a discount on COVID-friendly, elopement-style wedding packages for LGBTQ+ members of the LGBTQ+ community looking to getting married this summer.

To book this wedding package (this offer aims to increase access for communities that may face barriers to getting married)

Learn more at the link below.

For more information, please contact us online.

Thank you for supporting UBC Botanical Garden.

Visit Nitobe Memorial Garden

Experience harmony in nature at Nitobe Memorial Garden. This year, we are offering a discount on COVID-friendly, elopement-style wedding packages for LGBTQ+ members of the LGBTQ+ community looking to getting married this summer.

To book this wedding package (this offer aims to increase access for communities that may face barriers to getting married)

Learn more at the link below.

For more information, please contact us online.

Thank you for supporting UBC Botanical Garden.